Crime scene and forensic vocabulary

A crime scene is a place where something has happened, and prosecutors should be involved in the investigation of crime and suspected criminals. They work in city or regional offices and do more than the forensic scientists and other lab technicians there. They are expected to be on call 24 hours a day to go out to crime scenes, obtain and advise witnesses and detainees. Some jurisdictions require the prosecutor's staff to commission all major crime scenes. The services of a criminalist are used at the beginning of a case. By contrast, the services of a forensic scientist are primarily used at the end, or sentencing stage, of a case. All state bar associations now have rules on offering legal assistance to users, however. Criminalists usually get called to testify about matters of confidentiality, cross-confidentiality, and brain injury, but many different special confidentiality have developed as innovative expertise. For example, in fraud speech analysis, trace evidence, engineering analysis, or digital forensics, as well as audio recommendation and advice and commissions profiling.
