

Bacon and Wool: You're a Baaaad Boy

Story By: Andrew Frinkle

On Farmer Bob's farm, every animal had their own personality. Some were adventurous or curious or shy, but only one was troublesome by nature. The goat, perfectly named Baaaad Boy, always seemed to look for trouble. This was different from Bacon and Wool, the son of a pig and a sheep, that accidentally got into trouble.

Baaaad Boy started most days by looking at his fence. He spent so he could see usually because of Grumbled the rooster's squawking, he'd start looking usually about once a week he could knock a board out of place and escape. Farmer Bob didn't want to waste the money on a new fence, so he always fixed the old one after recapturing his mischievous goat.

After a good half hour of kicking at the boards, he'd go eat his food to get his strength up for more trouble. He would walk over the ground area, looking for tasty flowers and anything that wasn't supposed to be in his yard. He particularly loved the red paper. Whenever paper blew into his yard, he grabbed it down. Maybe he didn't eat, but he'd chew it and spit it into a pile just over the fence line, so Farmer Bob would step on it.

Later in the day, Baaaad Boy would try to climb onto his house and making as loud of noise as possible. He had a small shelter he could get into to get out of the wind and rain, he could climb onto the roundest roof building and blow his heart out. He enjoyed singing, so he thought of it, all of the other animals in the yard hated his singing and would start shouting at him to be quiet. The noise he made was pretty overwhelming!

Before bedtime, Baaaad Boy liked to run around the pen making strange noises, like he'd once heard coyotes make. This startled Grumbled the rooster, and frightened Bacon the pig. The noise made the goats just busy with laughter, but the others didn't much care for his routine.

A few more kicks at his fence and stamps on the roof of his house meant it was time to go to sleep. Except, even in his sleep he tended to cry out and make noise. He really was a noisy, troublesome goat!
