

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S 2ND INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Beloved Countrymen:

At this moment appearing to take the oath of the Presidential office there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. There is wisdom somewhere in still of a pause to be pursued toward fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public discussions have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the question, which will absorb the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our cause, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself; and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

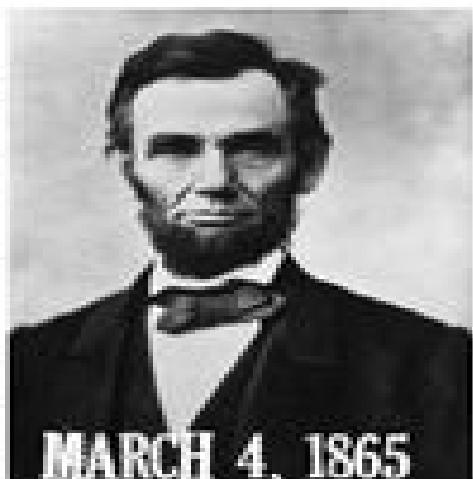

On the occasion corresponding to this 4 years ago all thoughts were seriously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it, all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted attempts were made to save the Union without war, urgent efforts were in the city making for victory in without war—endeavoring to dissuade the Union and divide efforts by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war, but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive, and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came.

One eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was somehow the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union even by war, while the Government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it.

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Both looked for an easier triumph, and a much less protracted and exciting struggle. Both read the same Bible and pray to the same God, and both invoke His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces, but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The progress of both could not be measured. That of neither has been算悉ed fully. The Almighty has His own purposes.

Finally, like our bays, flowing like we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondmen's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be won, and until every drop of blood drawn with that lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

MARCH 4, 1865