"Wow, we still haven't picked up any Halloween candy for the trick-or-treaters, and Halloween is this Friday," Holley reminded her mom as she finished up her homework.

"I know. I've been putting it off. I just hate buying candy that I know will go to waste," replied Pam.

"Are you kidding me?" Holley thought. "I almost went to the store that gives out gratis (free) candy just so they don't throw them away. Then, just because you're a diabetic doesn't mean we can't give away candy for Halloween! Halloween without candy would be like Independence Day without the fireworks!"

"You do have candy there," said Pam.

Holley tried not to grin, but she knew she almost had her mom convinced. "Well, you have candy for Halloween when you were a kid?"

"Well, yes. I know what I will do. I will give out some candy for trick-or-treaters, for Halloween," decided Pam.

"I guess that's better than an apple." "Good solution, Pam!" said Holley.

Another house light is turned off. You look at your watch. It's eight o'clock. Trick-or-treating is over for another year.

You turn to your friend and say, "It's a new record! We trick-or-treated for two hours and covered two more blocks than we did last year! That's about 30 extra houses!"

"Awesome! I don't know about you, but my legs are killing me. Let's head back to my house," your friend tells you.

You turn around. All of a sudden, the thought of walking all the way back to your house is overwhelming. "I have a better idea. I have my mom's cell phone. Let's call and ask one of my parents to come pick us up!"
