

Reading a classic novel

In the nineteenth century, some writers wanted their readers to understand more about the lives of others. In those days before television and the Internet, books were one of the most important ways of persuading people to think about the rest of the world.

In Chapters 9 and 17 of his novel Hard Times, Charles Dickens describes Coketown, an industrial city in the north of England. Read his descriptions of Coketown in these extracts.

It was a town of red brick, or of brick that would have been red if the smoke and ashes had allowed it: .... It was a town of machinery and tall chimneys, one of which unceasingly projects a smoke-tail that crawled themselves the earth and over, and never got uncoiled. It had a black canal in it, and a river that ran purple with discharging dye, and ever piles of buildings full of windows where there was a tortling and a roosting all day long, and where the pipes of the steam-engines worked incessantly up and down, like the head of an elephant in a state of melancholy madness. It contained several large sweep-off cars like one another, and many small sweep cars like one another, indiffused by people equally like one another, who all went in and out at the same hours, with the same round upon the same pentimento, to do the same work, and to return every day to the same as yesterday and tomorrow, and every year the counterpart of the last and the next.

... The sun was hot and dry on the summer day, and the air was so bright that it even shone through the heavy vapour drifting over Coketown, and could not be looked at steadily. Shoppers emerged from low underground passages into factory yards, and sat on steps, and posts, and palings, wiping their sweating visages, and contemplating coals. The whole town seemed to be living in oil. There was a stifling smell of hot oil everywhere. The steam-engines shone with it, the dresses of the flannel were soiled with it, the ugly troughs where many infants napped and wallked in ... they infestants, romping with heat, soiled lamponies in the dews. But no temperature could stir the melancholy-mad elephants more mad or more tame. Their melancholy heads went up and down at the same rate as fast weather and cold, wet weather and dry, fine weather and bad. The unceasing motion of their shadows on the walls, was the substance Coketown had to show the other shadows of nothing worse, while, for the number less of insects, it could offer, all the year round, from the jaws of Moloch to the right of Samson, the robes of snakes and sculls.