Text

Robert Martin often paints for his amusement and his work is quite good for a boy of his age. When it is fine weather, at the weekend, he paints the green grass of England, with brown cows lying in the sunlight, or the red-brown trees, under the grey sky of autumn. When it rains, and there is no football on Saturdays, he paints flowers at home: flowers of all colours standing in a pot on the table. But people are difficult to draw, and Robert does not do them all!

Fanny does not paint, but she takes lots of photos in colours. There are boxes and boxes of photos in her room: pictures of many places and people in France. Fanny shows them to her English friends: on dark winter days, they bring back to her the bright colours of summer, and the gay time of holidays.
