

"A Message to India", written by Lord Curzon, steps in the relations between the English and the native Indians during the colonial period in which Britain ruled India. The novel takes place mainly in Chandigarh, a city along the Ganges River famous for its lovely Pandua river.

On Ashraf Khan's journey to the Old Company's house while he was taking his dinner with friends, Ashraf noticed the officer's house for fear that the latter had left his house for club without leaving a message for him. He went for making of going back, but Englishmen stopped him by force and directed to his hotel house, leaving no concern with Ashraf. Thus the two are introduced to Ashraf that evening.

On his way to home he went to a mosque to visit. There, he came to know a glimpse of some English lady, Miss Farrow. Dr. Ashraf suddenly collected to take her down off to the mosque. In fact this Miss Farrow was based in the mosque. It took her 10-15 minutes to walk, Dr. Ashraf stayed with her in conversation.

Miss Farrow collected him in a friendly manner, telling him that she is in India to watch her working through the city Magistrate. She also knows the typical behavior of English people to the native Indians. She told Dr. Ashraf to tell her about the situation of his country for Lord Curzon's rule.

Miss Farrow claimed, having a respect for her husband that she wanted to see the condition, not the India who is seen from through the influence of atmosphere of British colony. In short, she, an English officer decided to arrange equality and peace in "India for by".

There is called "Indigenism" was completely failed to meet the purpose because the English people retained a particular eye to the party and did not believe in
