

Zombies at the Door

I could hear the zombies banging on the front door. They had been doing it all night. Banging and then scraping and then silence. At first we thought the silence meant that the zombies had given up and gone away. But the noise always started again. I was exhausted; Melissa and Jake were exhausted.

"Look," Melissa whispered. She turned her head towards the front door and it's loosening up hinge that was clearly cracking under the pressure. In only moments it would come off and the barrier between the zombies and us would be broken. I leapt around the kitchen table and began pushing my old lounge. It was a heavy thing, made of solid wood and thick upholstery, so it was slow going. Luckily, Melissa and Jake joined in and before you could say, "dead man's chest" we had pushed the three-seater beast, with a cracking thud, against the door.

The zombie banging stopped. Silence. Two unassuming minutes passed and then as always, a chorus of groans followed by a new round of banging. I don't know if I was imagining it, but it seemed louder and more insistent this time. Bang! Bang! Bang! We all watched as the door shook and shifted slightly but remained in place. Thankfully, for now, the zombies were staying on the other side.

"That was close," said Jake, sweat peeling on his pasty forehead. "We need to get out of here before they try something else."

I sat down at my kitchen table. It seemed ordinary enough with its scattering of used cups, a two-day-old newspaper and Melissa's set of keys. For the past three years, I had sat here perfectly safe, drinking my tea, eating my cereal and chatting with my friends. Now my safe haven had sinking zombie cadaver seeping in from under the front door and a relentless-terrifying banging.

"Ya," I agreed, "we need to get out of here. Any ideas?"
