

BRITISH COUNCIL, INSTITUTO DE TRADUCCION COMPLE
ESTADOS UNIDOS DE AMERICA - LONDRES

ENCUENTRO

A French scientist coming to Vienna for a conference on human genetics or Polish designer negotiating with prospective clients in Stockholm or Polish tourist chatting with local shopkeepers in Leeds: they all communicate successfully in "English", but which "English" is it, precisely, so that it is not the language you find in that street and shop or British television news, but rather a range of "Englishes", with enough of commonalities to make it viable as a means of communication.

In fact, "English" has acquired a plural form - "Englishes" - to refer to any of the varieties of English spoken around the world, such as Australian English, Canadian English, South African English, Cockney or British English, American English and, to put them all somewhat loosely, British English.

The international spread of English is now taken for granted, but we still acknowledge one the implications of this spread, especially in terms of the "Englishes" that have resulted from it. Indeed, only standard British and standard American English are regarded as the legitimate versions of the language.

Nevertheless, there are further attempts to smooth out the various forms of international English. The intention is to remove the distinction between British and American spelling, the adjustment of which at the moment takes up so much of our time conscientiously.

At the moment the dictionary has reached the stage of being as flat as a pancake: all disputes over spelling will die, "color" or "colour" will still be printed as correct, however, we haven't yet reached the point where we can expect that either system will die, but we will be working with the intention.

The concept of international English is a relatively new because there is not a conventional speaker of the variety, just varieties of regional varieties happen to meet in an international forum, so it will only be a slight modification to each particular regional variety, to create a common of English speakers (like they have not been decided by some by force, by need, by migration to international organizations, perhaps the sense of an international community will grow stronger and the need for a form of sharing of an international English will become more apparent).

Multiple, pluralist (collected).