

The Last Tail

Story By: Andreea Andrei

I was a dragon with eight tails, I had been born as a dragon with no tail. But through learning many important lessons, my magical nature had allowed me to grow eight tails. With each tail had come more lessons, and those lessons made me more and more human.

I was having my choice, the choice that would change me forever. All I needed was one more tail, and that meant one more lesson to learn. I both hated humans to it and dreaded it, but still I chose it. I knew it would have to choose to become human or something else. What would that something else be? Would I become a simple fox? I didn't want that. Would I just stay as a dragon, a dragon forever trapped between the lines of humans and animals? I wasn't even I wanted that, either, but what would it mean to be human?

I imagined having a regular human name and life. I imagined living in a small wooden house, sleeping at night and being afraid of the things beyond the village. I saw fire humans burn, with sadness and suspicion. I also saw these great things could be. Nothing was as wonderful as their children. They were so alive yet hopeful. Life was real and difficult but painless though.

Running cold sweat, how should I act like a human if I became one? I'd already built far beyond the lifespan of a fox. My dear mother Fox and my father, my two siblings, were long gone. Other years, I'd grown beyond being a simple fox to being this creature that had and watched humans, growing weaker but never becoming human enough. I'd watched and learned, finally dying, I didn't even feel older, just wiser.

It was strange, but it came upon me in the daylies. In thinking about my nature and my future, in trying to decide what I was, my mouth and tail felt green. It started then, because it is a painful process to transform yourself, and yet this one grew without pain and it was mobile. It was older than me now than that this final tail grows.

And with the ninth tail, I felt much changed. I felt like a different being. I glowed with inner light. The last tail was different. Between the previous ones were others and glowed with the moon's energies. This one was bright and yellow gold. It was hard to look at it. It presented a choice. I had to choose my nature, and my choices were three today: Fox, Fox a dragon, or be a human. I had until sunset to choose my answer, or it would be made for me.

I took the first part of the pathpost before a tree. I sat among the trees, thoughts clear and caught that I enjoyed in the freedom of running and jumping, I laid in the sun and enjoyed the breeze across my face. The second part of the pathpost I spent in a Quonset.
