

Reading a classic novel

In the nineteenth century, some authors wanted their readers to understand more about the lives of others. In those days before television and the Internet, books were one of the most important ways of persuading people to think about the rest of the world.

In Chapters 5 and 17 of his novel Hard Times, Charles Dickens describes Coketown, an industrial city in the north of England. Read his descriptions of Coketown in these extracts.

It was a town of red brick, or of brick that would have been red if the smoke and ashes had allowed it. ... It was a town of machinery and tall chimneys, out of which interminable serpents of smoke trailed themselves for ever and ever, and never got uncoiled. It had a black canal in it, and a river that ran purple with ill-smelling dye, and vast piles of building full of windows where there was a rattling and a rumbling all day long, and where the piston of the steam-engine worked monotonously up and down, like the head of an elephant in a state of melancholy madness. It contained several large streets all very like one another, and many small streets still more like one another, inhabited by people equally like one another, who all went in and out at the same hours, with the same sound upon the same pavements, to do the same work, and to whom every day was the same as yesterday and tomorrow, and every year the counterpart of the last and the next.

... The streets were hot and dusty on the summer day, and the sun was so bright that it even shone through the heavy vapour drooping over Coketown, and could not be looked at steadily. Shoppers emerged from low underground doorways into factory yards, and sat on steps, and posts, and railings, wiping their sweating visages, and contemplating coal. The whole town seemed to be frying in oil. There was a stifling smell of hot oil everywhere. The steam-engines throbbed in, the drivers of the Hounds were filled with it, the mills throughout their many stories creaked and tickled it ... their inhabitants, waiting with heat, rolled languidly in the dust. But no temperature made the melancholy-mad elephants move mad or more tame. Their sweating heads went up and down at the same rate in hot weather and cold, wet weather and dry, fair weather and foul. The measured motion of their shadows on the walls, was the substance Coketown had no show for the shadows of rusting woods, while, for the sunless boughs of mayors, it could offer, all the year round, from the dawn of Monday to the night of Saturday, the whine of shafts and wheels.