1. Humans that pollute

Humans bring destruction from a place where it feels at home. Polar bears are at home in the Arctic, lions and tigers in the African grasslands. The place where a creature feels at home is called its natural habitat. You shall not harm its own habitat. You have only one Earth and you must know your neighbours, even if you are not friends with all of them. It is the same for all other creatures. These natural habitats are places where they and their ancestors have lived for perhaps millions of years. They are used to other animals and the other species in the same habitat. Many others will threaten and kill like the ones we eat of habitats. Conservationists begin by saving species which were threatened by stopping hunting, poaching, or overfishing. Now, people realize that we are in danger to our environment. We have been to be saved as well. Natural habitats are in danger everywhere. When people cut down forests or clear meadows the creatures which lived in those habitats must have nowhere else to go.

2. Why conserve?

We are faced with an important decision. We know that thousands of different species are threatened with becoming extinct. Once they are gone, they will never come back. There are probably thousands more in existence that we don't know about because we haven't discovered them yet. Conservationists save some of these species, but save money and affects people's lives. Why should we bother with it?

3. Looking after ourselves

We need the other creatures in the biosphere because they provide us with food, building materials, fuel, and medicine. However we must use these carefully and sparingly. If we destroy the biosphere because we are greedy or just stupid, then we will die out ourselves. If we look after it, we shall survive, and we will all the other creatures. So conserving the biosphere means looking after ourselves.
