

The Trail of Tears

By 1830 the Cherokee had been made by Americans and a complete new society had been formed among the "Reds." They were to receive the same of education, medicine, and other things as the whites of the United States. The study of the book into American history told them they had completely civilized the nation, giving the same and better opportunities to the people than the Americans had.

They were not only civilized, but they were also educated, and the same of the white Americans. They had learned to read, write, and speak the same language as the white Americans. They had a system of laws, a system of courts, and a system of government. They had a system of education, and they were not only educated, but they were also civilized. They were not only civilized, but they were also educated, and they were also civilized. They were not only civilized, but they were also educated, and they were also civilized.

But the white men would not let them stay in their own land. In 1830 the United States passed the Indian Removal Act. It gave the government the power to remove the Indians from their land to a new land in the West. The Indians were not happy, but they had to go. The government would not let them stay in their own land. The Indians were not happy, but they had to go. The government would not let them stay in their own land. The Indians were not happy, but they had to go.

When the white men passed the Indian Removal Act, the Indians were not happy. They were not happy to leave their own land. They were not happy to go to a new land. They were not happy to leave their own land. They were not happy to go to a new land. They were not happy to leave their own land. They were not happy to go to a new land.

In 1838 the Indian Removal Act was passed by a vote of 267 to 91. The white men were not happy. They were not happy to leave their own land. They were not happy to go to a new land. They were not happy to leave their own land. They were not happy to go to a new land. They were not happy to leave their own land. They were not happy to go to a new land.
