Samuel Gompers

Samuel Gompers was an important labor leader who worked to improve the lives of workers in the United States.

He was born in 1850 in England and moved to America with his family when he was a teenager.

As a young man, he worked as a cigar maker and saw that many workers had long hours, low pay, and unsafe working conditions.

In 1886, Gompers helped create the American Federation of Labor (AFL), a group of labor unions that worked together to protect workers' rights. He believed that workers should earn fair wages, work fewer hours, and have safe places to do their jobs. Instead of using violence, Gompers encouraged workers to organize, negotiate, and work together to make positive changes.

Samuel Gompers also supported the idea of honoring workers for their hard work and contributions to society. During his lifetime, labor unions became stronger, and many workers gained better pay and improved working conditions. His leadership helped inspire future generations to continue fighting for fairness in the workplace.

Today, Samuel Gompers is remembered as one of the most influential labor leaders in American history. His dedication to improving workers' lives is one reason Labor Day is celebrated each year to recognize the efforts and achievements of working people.
